boiled up this morning at the Capitol and the resolution came up for a vote. It was debated all the morning and will continue to be debated to-morrow until the vote is taken. The governor did not want me to leave, and although there is no real reason for my staying I am doing so because I think it looks better.

I had a most pleasant luncheon with Clark Howell and his wife and two others. I am being asked for dinners and things, but do not think I can stay long enough to go to them. Am invited to one for Friday and the Governor and Mrs. Dorsey are asked to meet me. Am now going for a little motor ride with one of my fellow guests at the luncheon to-day. They are all lovely to me, but have a horror of militant methods, and I find myself explaining to their unwilling ears.

Do not expect me until I let you know. I may be detained several days longer. In any event, I hope to be with you early next week.

Give Louise Atherton my love and tell her that I should like to see her too.

Love,

Ma.
